

Charter City Toronto Proposal

*Starting the Conversation Around Empowering
Toronto and Other Canadian Cities*

Fall 2019

CHARTER CITY
TORONTO

Contents

|                                    |           |
|------------------------------------|-----------|
| Proposal Overview           | 3  |
| The Case for a City Charter | 6  |
| The Charter Proposal        | 10 |
| A. Governance                      | 11        |
| B. Constitutional Protection       | 12        |
| C. Powers and Authority            | 13        |
| Exclusive City Jurisdictions       |           |
| Land Use Planning                  | 14        |
| Streets                            | 15        |
| Housing                            | 15        |
| Local Transit                      | 15        |
| Health                             | 16        |
| Education                          | 17        |
| Shared Jurisdictions               |           |
| Human Services                     | 17        |
| Immigration and Settlement         | 18        |
| Police and Security                | 18        |
| D. Resources: Revenue and Finances | 19        |
| E. Access, Equity, and Inclusion   | 21        |
| F. Indigenous Relations            | 22        |
| The Bigger Picture          | 24 |

North York | Photo Credit: benny_lin, Flickr

Proposal Overview

There's been a lot of talk lately about empowering the city of Toronto and other big cities. Adopting a City Charter is often mentioned as a way to give the city the power and authority it needs to govern its own affairs.

But what would a City Charter look like? What would be in it? What would it do for cities? This proposal is an attempt to begin that conversation.

Two-Part Process

Charter City Toronto proposes a two-part process toward greater power and autonomy for the city of Toronto. We believe this can serve as a template for other cities in Ontario and Canada who wish to achieve greater control over their own affairs.

1. City Charter

The city and the province--with substantial public consultation--will create and pass a City Charter for Toronto. The Charter will give the city enhanced power and jurisdiction over city affairs.

2. Constitutional Amendment

The province and federal government will pass a single-province amendment to the Canadian Constitution that enables the creation of Charter Cities in Ontario and protects them from provincial interference in areas of municipal jurisdiction.

This proposal is not a final set of ideas, but rather the start of a conversation. We hope it will be widely discussed, massaged, amended, and changed to produce a document that has wide agreement.

Four Key Principles

This proposal makes recommendations for a City Charter to cover four key principles: Governance, Protection, Authority and Resources.

Governance

The city of Toronto would regain the authority to determine its own governing structures. The province unilaterally revoked that authority in 2018. The city would have full control over: city council and the Mayor's office; the city bureaucracy; agencies, boards, commissions; community councils; oversight and accountability, and elections, including ward boundaries.

Protection

We propose that the provincial and federal governments create and pass a single-province amendment to the Canadian Constitution. The amendment would define Charter Cities and end their status as “creatures of the province” whose every decision—and very existence—is subject to provincial override. No changes could be made to the City Charter without the express consent of the city.

Authority

The Charter would place exclusive responsibility and authority for key municipal functions clearly in the hands of an empowered city government. The starting point is all the powers the city has now in the City of Toronto Act. Other areas for exclusive city authority would be: land use planning, streets, housing, local transit, human services, public health, education up to Grade 12 and selected powers of taxation.

Where necessary, the city and province would share authority in certain areas, but with clear rules defining the roles and authorities of the two partners. These could include: health, immigrant settlement, policing and others. The city would be empowered to make arrangements, financial and otherwise, directly with other governments, including other cities.

Resources

The Charter would give the city control over (not just access to) the revenues and resources it needs to meet its responsibilities. It would also continue the practice of sharing the wealth generated in the city with its municipal neighbours, the province and the country as a whole.

Context

Charter Cities are Common

City Charters that give cities strong inherent powers are common in Europe and the US, with over a hundred in California alone. Many European cities have Charters also.

Several Canadian cities have what are commonly referred to as City Charters, including Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Winnipeg, Saint John and others. In each case, these Canadian “Charters” are provincial legislation, which can be unilaterally amended or revoked by the province. By contrast, we propose a constitutionally protected City Charter that can only be adopted or amended with the consent of the city.

Single Province Amendments are also Common

There have been eight such amendments since the Constitution was repatriated in 1982. Under Section 43 of the Constitution, single-province amendments need only the approval of the provincial legislature and the federal parliament. This makes them easier to achieve than amendments covering the country as a whole, which require the consent of at least seven provinces that have 50 per cent of Canada's population.

How a Charter Protects the City

Once the basic rules of governing a city are laid out and adopted in a City Charter, constitutional protection means those rules can only be changed if the city consents.

If Toronto had a City Charter as we propose in 2018, the Ford government would not have been able to reduce city council and revoke Toronto's powers of governance against the will of the city. Nor could the province unilaterally change the rules for amending the Charter. That would require the agreement of the federal parliament.

No rules are fireproof, but the ones we propose would afford solid protection for the city.

Scarborough Civic Center | Photo Credit: wyliepoon, Flickr

The Case for a City Charter

Toronto has been democratically governed even before Canada was created in 1867. But at Confederation, provinces were allocated absolute power over municipalities. Cities were given no powers or authorities of their own.

In 1867, 80 per cent of Canadians lived in rural areas. At that time, powerful provinces were needed to unite the large, sparsely populated countryside, to pool resources and to provide good government.

Cities were an afterthought.

These arrangements are antique and inadequate to the demands placed on cities in the 21st century.

Today, 80 per cent of Canadians live in cities. 1 in 10 lives in Toronto. 1 in 5 lives in the GTA.

Toronto's 3,000,000 residents elect the sixth-largest government in the country, but have far less power over their own affairs than the 150,000 people of Prince Edward Island.

Canada's cities are mature levels of government in their own right, capable of handling the full range of municipal responsibilities, given the resources and the authority to do so.

The Power Imbalance

For most of our shared history, despite the inherent power imbalance, the province has supported cities as a close partner and ally. It recognized that Toronto's success meant success for the province and the country. But since the late 20th century, provinces have sought instead to impose their will on cities and on the city of Toronto in particular:

-
- 1998 Ontario forced the amalgamation of Toronto's six municipalities into a mega-city over the objections of the city government and citizens in a referendum. This has been recognized by most as a major mistake for which the city is still paying. Over many years, the province has downloaded responsibilities to the city without adequate revenue sources, leaving the city dependent on the province for handouts in order to pay its day-to-day bills.
  - 2017 The city was made more dependent on and more vulnerable to the province when it vetoed the city's decision to toll inner-city expressways in order to raise money for transit.
  - 2018 The province vaporized half of City Council in the middle of an election and took away the city's ability to design its own forms of governance. It threatened to rescind Torontonians' rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in order to do achieve the cuts. The city, powerless under the Canadian constitution, could do nothing to stop it.
  - 2019 The province took control of decision-making over Toronto's local transit projects and threatened to take ownership of the city's subways. It threw out two critical urban plans for the city's downtown and midtown, wasting years of work and consultations with city residents. It rescinded the city's power to get property developers to pay for community infrastructure and benefits such as parks, libraries and child care spaces from property developers.

All of these provincial actions, and others, have left the city poorer and less able to run its own affairs. A city can't succeed when its decisions are continually subject to arbitrary provincial override. Or when provincial plans are foisted upon the city without consultation or notice. Or when the city is perpetually denied the ability to raise the funds it needs.

By giving the city more control over its own affairs through a City Charter, and by giving the city a veto over any changes to the Charter, unilateral provincial interference would be made much more difficult, if not impossible. A more even playing field will help return Toronto and Ontario to a relationship of co-operation and partnership.

Benefits of a City Charter for Toronto

A City Charter will empower the city of Toronto to face its future with new democratic and financial tools and without fear of provincial interference.

- A constitutionally protected City Charter outlining the city's authority, governance and taxation powers, amendable only with city consent, will lend the city status, stability and protection.
- Strong local decision-making will put the city's future in our own hands. Decision-makers will be accountable to city voters, not to voters from across the province.
- The city will be free to consider new and innovative forms of government that can bolster public participation and decisions that reflect the diversity of the city, local values and urban aspirations.
- The city will be free to innovate and find creative solutions to city issues, including congestion, density, affordability, livability and sustainability--without unnecessary provincial permissions or fear of a provincial veto.
- Stable, predictable, city-controlled, multi-year revenues will provide sufficient funds to pay for necessary programs and services and ensure that growth pays for growth. Access to progressive revenue sources that grow with the economy will restore balance and fairness to its financial relationship with the province.
- Eliminating duplicate levels of approvals and achieving clarity over who makes decisions will be a significant benefit for the business community, which values regulatory simplicity and certainty.
- Establishing clear jurisdictions and roles for both the city and the province in municipal affairs will streamline decision-making and reduce duplication, unnecessary oversight and friction between governments. This will clear the decks for co-operation on matters of truly mutual interest.

Cities Need Tools for the Future

The people of Toronto have the brains, talent, ambition and love for the city to successfully run their own affairs. We are a diverse, wealthy, fast-growing city that strives to be confident, inclusive, innovative, modern and forward-looking. Toronto is a global city that competes internationally in such fields as culture, finance, sports, health sciences, manufacturing and technology.

Our quality of life is among the highest in the world. In study after study, Toronto has been ranked among the top 10 global cities for safety, livability, cost of living, business environment, democracy, and food security. On a planet of increasing global mobility, Toronto is among the best at attracting the sophisticated, educated and innovative talent from around the world. Each year, the Greater Toronto Area welcomes and settles more than 100,000 newcomers—refugees and immigrants alike—from other parts of the world seeking a better life.

Toronto is an economic driver of Canada, contributing one-tenth of Canada's GDP every year—about $200 billion. Toronto recognizes that partnership with Ontario and Canada is vital to its success and embraces its responsibility to fairly share its wealth with its neighbouring cities, the province and the country.

However, city taxpayers also contribute billions more tax dollars a year to the province than come back in contributions to the city's budget.

It's estimated that in Canada, cities typically keep a mere 10 per cent of the taxes paid by city residents. The rest goes to senior levels of government. Contributions from those levels of government often come with strings attached that do not allow the city to do what it thinks is best.

Toronto needs new arrangements in order to succeed:

- Clear jurisdiction and authority over city affairs
- Control of revenues sufficient to meet the city's needs
- Constitutional protection from provincial interference

Accordingly:

1. The city and the province should, through public consultation, negotiation and joint legislation, create a City Charter for the Toronto which:
  - Creates a more equal relationship between the city and the province, empowers local democracy and protects the city from undue provincial interference in city affairs
  - Establishes exclusive city jurisdiction, and removes provincial oversight, over all municipal functions not specifically allocated to the province, including city governance, land use planning and appeals, streets, housing, local transit, public health, and education up to Grade 12.
  - Establishes clear roles for the city, province and federal government, including protected funding arrangements, in areas of overlapping or shared jurisdiction such as health, human services (including social services and child care), immigrant settlement and policing.
  - Establishes a new, stable fiscal regime whose aim is to give the city control of resources commensurate to its responsibilities, allowing Toronto to keep a greater share of the taxes currently paid by city residents to higher levels of government. It will give the city access to new, progressive revenue sources, such as income and sales tax, and to new financing tools such as municipal bonds.
2. The province and the federal government should enact a single-province amendment under Section 43 of the Canadian Constitution that enables City Charter status for Toronto that requires the city's consent for any changes to the Charter.

Toronto City Hall Council Chambers | Photo Credit: dexus, Flickr

The Charter Proposal

For more than 30 years, there has been discussion about how cities in Canada can gain more authority and the powers and freedom necessary to govern their own affairs.

City Charters from other jurisdictions have been suggested as models from which ideas might be taken – Los Angeles, San Francisco and Chicago, for example. California alone has more than 100 Charter Cities with dedicated municipal powers, including the broad power of taxation, and a high level of autonomy from state governments.

At different times, some Canadian cities have been given special powers by provincial legislation, but these special powers have been subject to limitations: the exercise of powers granted is subject to ongoing provincial approval and the province can unilaterally change or repeal those powers with no requirement to consult the city.

Another issue is that many programs upon which cities depend are cost-shared with the provincial government. Whenever that government decides to reduce its share of funding, programs delivered at the municipal level suffer. Since city governments typically have very limited revenue powers, they are often unable to find the money to continue those programs and residents lose out.

Our Charter proposal attempts to overcome those limitations in three ways.

- First, we propose to remove provincial oversight and control over what are essentially municipal functions.
- Second, we propose a constitutional amendment to protect the powers and arrangements contained in the Charter.
- Third, we propose entrenching some permanent funding arrangements in the Charter.

A City Charter is essentially an agreement between the city and the provincial government outlining the powers and authorities of the city, some of which are exclusive to the city and some of which are shared with the province.

Our proposal covers four broad areas: Governance, Power and Authorities, Resources, and Constitutional Protection.

A. Governance

The City of Toronto Act (2006) gave the city the power to establish its own form of governance, subject to review by the Ontario Municipal Board. The province revoked that power in 2018 with legislation that unilaterally reduced the number of city councilors from 47 to 25, in addition to changing the ward system. A Charter should restore those powers to the city and remove the provincial power of review. To ensure that City Council is not self-serving in setting out forms and structures and that the public interest is primary, Council decisions on governance should be reviewed by an independent agency appointed by City Council.

3. The city should have the power to adopt decision-making procedures and structures that ensure fair representation of the many diverse voices, minorities, and communities in the city, which enhance residents' involvement in decisions about their communities, and which enshrine and enact principles of equity.
4. The city should have the exclusive authority to decide the form and structure of its government, including the composition of city council and ward boundaries, the mayor's office, the city bureaucracy, agencies, boards and commissions, community councils, and other such bodies as it finds appropriate. Council should have the power to decide on approval mechanisms, including innovative ones designed to enhance citizen involvement, such as deliberative democracy and referendums.
5. An independent, city-appointed body should review changes to the ward system. Its decision, after a fair hearing, will be reported to Council for a final determination. City Council should be given the exclusive authority to establish and fund this independent body.
6. The city should have the exclusive authority to conduct municipal elections, including regulation of campaign donations and finance, voting age and eligibility, including the ability to extend the vote to residents who are not citizens. Again, these rules should be subject to review by an independent, city-appointed body, and reported to Council for a final determination.
7. The city should have broad powers to pass bylaws respecting all aspects of city life, and establish penalties for contraventions.
8. The city should be required to establish an effective integrity and accountability regime including a Members Code of Conduct, an Integrity Commissioner, Auditor General, Lobbyist Registry, and Ombudsman.
9. The city should be permitted to delegate decision-making, including quasi-judicial and legislative functions, to committees of council, staff, boards, community councils and other such bodies it thinks appropriate.
10. The city should work and co-operate with many other governments. It should be authorized to exercise any of its powers or perform any of its functions and may participate in the financing of its efforts, jointly or in cooperation, by contract or otherwise, with one or more other municipalities, regions, other governmental bodies, the Province of Ontario and the government of Canada.

B. Constitutional Protection

The key to the adoption of any City Charter is constitutional protection. Without such protection, Toronto will continue to be at the mercy of provincial whim.

A City Charter that is merely provincial legislation, such as the City of Toronto Act, can be amended or revoked unilaterally by any provincial government, without notice to, consultation with, or agreement of the city.

It would be pointless for Toronto to do the considerable work necessary to negotiate and implement long-term powers, authority and funding arrangements if they are not then protected from the arbitrary actions of a more senior level of government. A deal that can be revoked by one party is no deal at all.

In order to protect and guarantee the City Charter, we propose a single-province amendment to the Canadian Constitution that would:

- Enable the creation of Charter Cities in Ontario
- Spell out the rules for amending any such Charter in the future
- Guarantee that changes can only be made with the consent of the city.

A single-province amendment, in this case applying only to Ontario, requires only the consent of the Ontario legislature and the federal parliament.

How It Would Work

Any Ontario city could request to negotiate a Charter with the province. The province would be required to enter into such negotiations in good faith and, once a deal is reached, it would be required to pass the necessary legislation to make it so. The resulting City Charter would be amendable only by agreement of the city.

A single-province amendment to the Canadian Constitution (under Section 43) is the proposed vehicle to achieve this protection.

There have been seven single-province amendments to the Constitution since it was adopted in 1982. Newfoundland passed one in 1997 to establish a secular school system. The same year, Quebec established a language-based school system through a Section 43 amendment. New Brunswick passed one in 1993 to establish equality between the province's French and English-speaking communities.

Wording of the Amendment

This proposal does not suggest wording for such an amendment. Constitutional scholars differ on the best way to enshrine protection for a City Charter and they should be consulted on the best approach to achieve the principles outlined here.

However, we believe it's important that the City Charter itself not be entrenched in the Constitution. Doing so would mean any Charter change would be a constitutional change, involving the provincial and federal governments, but not the city. Putting the Charter in the constitution would in effect double the number of senior governments whose permission Toronto would need to change its own Charter.

Leaving the Charter as a freestanding document, protected by but not part of the Constitution, provides greater flexibility. Within existing city jurisdiction, Toronto could change the Charter on its own. For changes that alter the relationship between the province and the city, both sides would need to agree to such changes.

Some City Charters, such as the one adopted by Los Angeles, allow changes only through majority vote of city residents in a referendum. This additional level of Charter protection is somewhat foreign to the Canadian practice, but it could be considered, as a way to ensure voters agree to any change, as a way for a sufficient number of citizens to themselves propose a Charter amendment, or as a way to solve an impasse between the city and the province.

Protection

It's important to note that no constitutional arrangement can be one hundred percent effective at protecting cities from a province determined to interfere. A provincial government, with a compliant federal government, could ultimately override the City Charter through a new amendment to the constitution. But this would take time, and give the city the opportunity to mount a defence. Provincial and federal governments that conspire to thwart the will of a major Canadian city might pay such a political price that this avenue would be confined to infrequent use or never be used at all.

As has become very clear over the past year, the current constitutional arrangement, whereby cities are mere "creatures of the province" without any innate authority of their own, has left Toronto at an unacceptable disadvantage.

While Canada's constitutional rules do not allow for cities to gain co-equal status with a province, a City Charter with constitutional protection would give cities an immeasurably more powerful voice and status in any discussion of municipal affairs.

C. Powers and Authority

This section outlines the powers and authorities that seem appropriate for the city of Toronto. This is a draft set of proposals and can be changed and amended as public discussion proceeds.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES

The powers outlined in the Charter should be interpreted broadly, not in a limited fashion. The powers may be exercised by the city without provincial approval.

11. All powers given to the city in the Charter should be subject to all provincial and federal legislation of general province-wide application. However, if that legislation is contrary to the City Charter, the Charter should prevail. The city should be entitled with its own funds to increase or enhance any standards set by the province or the federal government.

The Charter should clearly define the jurisdictions in which the city acts exclusively, without provincial oversight or approval. It should clarify the roles of the city and province in shared jurisdictions where both parties co-operate and each contributes resources.

12. The city should continue to have all powers set out in the City of Toronto Act (and any other applicable legislation). Where there is a conflict between that legislation and the City Charter, the Charter should prevail.

13. Where powers over any aspect of the municipal sphere has never been allocated to either government, particularly if the subject is new or not previously contemplated (an example might be ride-sharing), the city should be permitted to exercise the powers it deems appropriate to address the matter without a specific amendment to the Charter.
14. Generally, any matter within the municipal sphere of activities that is not allocated to the province in the Charter, should be deemed to be the exclusive jurisdiction of the city. As a starting point, jurisdictions already allotted to the city under the City of Toronto Act (for example: Parks and Recreation, Water and Waste Services, Parking, Municipal Licenses and Standards, Economic Development, Urban Forestry) should formally become the exclusive jurisdiction of the city not subject to provincial oversight, override or repeal.
15. In addition, the city should exercise exclusive jurisdiction over: City Governance, Land Use Planning, Streets, Housing, Local Transit and Education.
16. Where the city exercises shared jurisdiction over certain areas with the province, such as Health, Human Services (including Child Care and Social Services), Immigrant Settlement and Policing, the roles of the respective players and funding arrangements should be clearly defined.

There are bound to be disputes about the meaning of some sections of the Charter, or about activities of the province or the city, to which either party may object.

17. The Charter should define a dispute resolution process. If the disagreement persists, the parties should resort not to the courts, but to the Arbitration Act, which sets out a fair process to settle disputes.

EXCLUSIVE CITY JURISDICTION

Land Use Planning

Land use planning concerns all aspects of property development – rezoning, Official Plans, land severance, committee of adjustment and others. Currently, most land use matters require approval by a provincial body, so that City Council is not in the position of being able to make final decisions. Ontario is one of the few provinces that does not allocate land use responsibilities solely to municipalities.

18. The city should have the exclusive power to deny, approve, or place restrictions on any land use planning application including Official Plans, zoning and rezoning, subdivisions, minor and major variances, and severance consents, without requiring the approval of any provincial body.
19. To ensure Council decisions are appropriate and in keeping with the public interest, land use decisions should be reviewed by an independent, city-appointed body and its decision, after a fair hearing, will be reported to Council for a final determination. The city should be given the authority to establish and fund such an independent body.

20. The city should be given the exclusive authority to establish and enforce development and intensification conditions such as minimum and maximum densities, heights, development charges, brown-field development goals, and controls to protect heritage and cultural features of structures and areas.

Streets

Many of the regulations and restrictions the city wishes to place on streets – stoplights, or the use of traffic wardens, for example – require provincial approval. This creates unnecessary duplication and expense and there's no reason to think that provincial officials would have a better handle on local traffic conditions than local officials.

21. The city should have the exclusive power to regulate the sidewalks, lanes, bicycle lanes, streets, roadways and non-provincial highways within its boundaries, including road design and construction, speed limits, traffic calming, congestion and climate change strategies, signals and signage, tolls, cameras, road closures, vehicle restrictions and all other traffic measures.

Housing

The city has a great interest in housing supply and conditions, including temporary housing, housing the homeless, social and affordable housing, and rental housing. It's not clear that the city currently has the power to exercise control over all these matters. The funding of social and affordable housing can be done through cost-sharing programs or, preferably, when the city secures the needed revenue tools, through its own financial resources.

22. The city should have the exclusive power to provide and regulate affordable and social housing, including setting rent/income levels.

23. The city should have the power to enter into cost-sharing arrangements with private and public agencies, other municipalities, Ontario and Canada for the provision of social and affordable housing.

24. The city should have the power to enter into agreements, including loans and mortgages, with various parties regarding the provision of social and affordable housing and to require certain levels of social and affordable housing be achieved in developments.

25. The city should have the exclusive authority to provide temporary housing accommodation for immigrants and refugees, and for the homeless.

26. The city should have the authority to control the demolition and conversion of rental housing, to control residential tenancies, to establish rent controls and to regulate short-term rentals.

Local Transit

Since the early 1920s, the city has always been a leader in public transit serving city and neighbouring residents. In the late 1940s it undertook the construction of Canada's first subway without provincial subsidies, using the surpluses produced by the transit system during the Second World War. Transit fares provide the majority of the Toronto Transit

Commission's revenue base, unlike other North American cities, which receive much higher levels of government subsidies. Despite the lack of support, the TTC has often been voted the best transit system in North America, an accolade bestowed as recently as 2017.

Funding problems have hobbled the transit system since it was expanded to serve the lower density suburban areas of Metro Toronto from the mid-1970s. At that time, the city was supported by provincial subsidies for both operating and capital expenditures. But those arrangements meant the province had a major say in how transit would be structured and designed in the city, and often their demands did not advance the cause of good public transit or reflect Toronto's priorities.

More recently, the province has decided that it will take over parts of the transit system. Serious questions have been asked about what the province's plans entail and whether this change will be of any benefit to transit riders in the city. The system today integrates subways, buses, streetcars and LRTs into a fully integrated network, providing advantages that could be lost if the system were to be split between multiple owners.

The best people to decide Toronto's transit needs are transit users, city officials and city politicians accountable to city voters, not provincial officials and politicians, many of whom do not live in Toronto or use the TTC.

27. The city should have the exclusive authority to provide and regulate public transit in the city. This should include Wheel-Trans, buses, streetcars, light rail, transit, subways, other transit conveyances and ancillary properties including Union Station (which the city owns.)
28. The city should have the authority to enter into agreements with other municipalities and/or transit agencies in the GTA, the province and Canada to provide and improve service, share costs, and to create a seamless regional transit system.

Health

Health policy and spending are matter of great importance to governments, particularly local governments. The Romanow Commission in 2002 recommended that much more attention be given to preventing illness and injury in order to reduce the need for hospitals and emergency medical treatments. The province has made moves to provide a more local health focus by coordinating services at the local level and strengthening local decision-making through the Local Health Initiative Network (LHINs).

LHINs were given control over all health expenditures at the local level, including hospitals, and were governed by provincially appointed boards. The province is now moving back to a more centralized health governance system without important local input and decision-making. The province has also announced its intention to substantially reduce allocations to public health matters, even though a robust public health system is thought to be the optimal way to contain health expenditures through improving social factors that lead to good health outcomes.

It is recognized that some health matters involve shared jurisdictions in decision-making and expenditures. It is also recognized that Toronto houses health facilities that serve the entire province and that jurisdictional arrangements must reflect this reality.

29. The city should have exclusive powers and functions similar to those granted to a Local Health Integration Network.
30. The city should have the authority to enter into agreements with the province for coordinating health issues and spending within the city.
31. The city should have exclusive responsibility for public health within the city.

Education

Until 20 years ago, education in the city was entirely funded from the property tax system, giving local school boards considerable flexibility in creating and operating programs to educate children within the city. The provincial government then took over all responsibility for funding education by seizing the property tax allocation for education purposes.

The result has been a provincial standardization of services and funding which has not served the city well: schools are falling into disrepair, and surplus school properties are not readily available for community purposes. Programs the school boards would like to fund are often cancelled when school boards are unable to find the needed money. The province dictates class sizes that are often seen as inappropriate. Trustees are grossly underpaid for their work. The city needs to regain control of its education system.

32. Education responsibilities, including funding and property tax allocations for education, should be in the exclusive control of the city and local school boards. This should apply to pre-school, primary school and secondary school matters.
33. Local school boards should have the exclusive authority to determine the governance structure and elections of its boards. To ensure those decisions are appropriate and in keeping with the public interest, they should be reviewed by an independent, city-appointed body established and appointed by the boards and its decision, after a fair hearing, will be reported to the boards for a final determination. The boards should be given the authority to establish and fund such an independent body.
34. Pooling of equalization payments from Toronto's property tax base for education purposes at the provincial level will be a matter of agreement between local boards, the city, and the province, and such agreement will respect the unique needs of educational expenditures in Toronto.

SHARED JURISDICTION

Human Services

More than one quarter of children in Toronto live in poverty. There is a serious income distribution problem occurring in the city. Responsibility for poverty-related issues is shared between the provincial and the federal governments, with the city playing a crucial role in delivering, and sometimes sharing in the cost of, programs that it has no role in developing.

For instance, monthly payments may be appropriate for other municipalities in Ontario, but are much too low to meet the higher cost of living in Toronto. Current arrangements are necessarily complex and can result in people falling through the cracks and leaving families impoverished. The most vulnerable were further disadvantaged when the provincial government unilaterally decided to reduce welfare benefits.

The city is in the best position to provide human services at the local level in order to ensure that programs are adequately funded, supported, and coordinated. It is recognized some human services may involve shared decision-making and shared expenditures.

35. The city should have exclusive jurisdiction of all social services and childcare programs in Toronto.
36. The city will require funding support for these services. It needs to ensure such funding is not arbitrarily reduced. This can occur in one of two ways:
  - i. Through the city receiving block funding from the federal and provincial governments equal to the amount spent on those programs in Toronto, to be increased annually according to some fair formula, for example, based upon cost of living increases; or
  - ii. Through the province determining the amount currently being transferred to the city for these programs, establishing that amount as a municipal revenue source representing a percentage of annual provincial revenue collected by the province, and transferring it annually to the city.

Immigrant and Refugee Settlement

More than 75 per cent of the immigrants and refugees coming to Ontario between 2011 and 2016 settled in the Toronto area. As Toronto City Council recently learned, it does not have the resources to ensure that they are adequately housed. There are also strains on programs related to teaching English as a Second Language, job training, and as well as other resettlement needs.

Successful immigrant settlement is important to the health and vibrancy of the city. It is recognized that these activities involve shared decision-making and shared funding. Given that the city already plays a large role in providing many of the services required by newcomers, such as housing, social assistance and counseling, it makes sense for the city to be the lead and coordinating agency for newcomer settlement.

37. The city should have the power to enter into agreements with the provincial source representing a percentage of annual provincial revenue collected by the province, and transferring it annually to the city.
38. The city must be involved with the provincial and federal governments in discussions about immigration, refugee levels and resettlement strategies.

Police and Security

Police governance in Toronto is provided by the Toronto Police Service Board (the size of which is constrained by provincial legislation) which sets how members will be appointed. The seven-member board has three members appointed by the province. A larger police board would allow for much more diversity in police management and decision-making.

The province makes some small grants for specific policing matters, but almost the entire one billion dollar annual police budget is funded from city sources. Policing involves shared responsibilities between the city and the province through the provincial Police Services Act.

In the interests of ensuring independent oversight of Toronto's police force, the province should continue to play its role in providing such oversight through such institutions as the Special Investigations Unit and the Office of the Independent Police Review Director.

39. The city should have exclusive power to determine the structure and size of the Police Services Board, including how members are appointed, while ensuring that the province may appoint one-third of the members of the board.

D. Resources: Revenue and Finances

REVENUE

Toronto recognizes that, as a strong generator and beneficiary of economic wealth, it has a responsibility to contribute its financial fair share to Ontario and Canada. Unfortunately, the current situation is not sustainable: with Toronto having access to only about 10 per cent of the taxes it sends to the two senior levels of government.

Given that imbalance, and the public's resistance to the introduction of new taxes, it is not enough to say Toronto should use the few revenue tools available to it under the City of Toronto Act. Such revenue tools are not progressive and simply cannot raise the amount of money required.

A greater share of existing taxation should accrue to Toronto as dedicated, Charter-protected municipal revenues. Toronto's share of these taxes should be commensurate with the city's contribution to Ontario and Canada and with the true cost of providing the programs and services as required by law. The city should control (not just be given or have access to) sufficient revenue to properly fund programs and services within its jurisdiction.

Toronto should also have control of sufficient revenue to properly fund its share of shared programs and services. Such an arrangement would provide stable, predictable revenue and reduce the friction of continually negotiating levels of funding, which fluctuate from government to government. To prevent duplication, the city could piggyback onto current provincial collection systems.

Time and again, Toronto has been deprived of important sources of revenue while expectations of service delivery at the local level have increased substantially.

Until 1936, when the province passed the Income Tax Act, Toronto and other Ontario municipalities had statutory authority to levy income taxes. Until 1944, Toronto had the authority to levy corporate taxes. In both cases, when the province removed these authorities, the city was paid a lump sum in compensation. Given current realities it now seems reasonable that these authorities be returned to the city.

Until the creation of the so-called megacity 20 years ago, the city had control of all the revenue produced by the property tax system, funding both city and Board of Education expenditures.

When the province took over the education system, it seized control of about half the city's property taxes for education funding purposes.

The province also has control over many aspects of the property tax system including assessment and the burdens placed on different classes of property, taking much of the important decision-making about property taxes out of the hands of the city. The negative results of this are now being felt by many of Toronto's property owners.

It is important that in the case of shared cost arrangements, the city be protected from unilateral provincial decisions reducing such payments.

40. The city should have direct access to existing progressive revenue sources that grow with the economy, taxes such as sales and income tax to be spent at the discretion of the city. The city should be given a dedicated portion of these existing taxes commensurate to current provincial contributions to the city's operating budget and the power to levy its own additional sales and income taxes if necessary.
41. The city should be given full control of the property tax system including the power to establish assessments, classes of property, and apportionment of tax burdens to different classes of property (such as to protect small business.) The city should control all property taxes raised in the city.
42. Responsibilities or expenditures should only be downloaded to the city from the province with the consent of the city, after adequate notice has been given in the budget cycle and revenues are transferred to city control sufficient to offset any additional costs to the city.
43. Arrangements for the funding of shared responsibilities must be worked out. The city could receive block funding from the federal and provincial governments equal to the amount spent on those programs in Toronto, increased annually according to some fair formula based upon, perhaps, increases in the cost of living.

Or the province could determine the amount transferred to the city for these programs and establish it as a municipal revenue source representing a percentage of annual provincial revenue collected by the province, and transfer it annually to the city.

No matter the form such funding arrangements take, it is essential that these revenues be stable, predictable, and permanent arrangements that can be changed or revoked only with the assent of the city.

FINANCES

Currently the city requires provincial approval to borrow money, a duplication of effort that is time consuming and costly. As well, some other financial matters require provincial approval.

44. The city should have exclusive authority to manage its financial affairs, including borrowing funds, budgeting for a short-term deficit, and tax increment financing with respect to property taxation.
45. The city should have the ability to use new financial tools, including self-financing powers such as municipal bonds, as required.

E. Access, Equity, and Inclusion

One of the extraordinary characteristics of Toronto is its diversity. And while it is remarkable that generally this incredible mélange of people lives together in relative harmony, many systemic inequities and structural barriers exist. Racism and other forms of systemic discrimination that exist in our city rob members of marginalized communities of their opportunity to live a healthy, safe and fulfilling life.

City Council must have the power and authority to address these issues, to help dismantle all forms of systemic discrimination and remove barriers for all people. This includes the challenges resulting from the cultural genocide of Indigenous peoples over many years, the racism faced by African Canadians and other people of colour, and the intersecting discrimination faced by women, people with disabilities, people of Islamic and other faiths, immigrants, refugees, LGBTQ++ people and others with precarious status.

These marginalized communities experience a much higher rate of poverty than the general population, with some communities being six times more likely than white Torontonians to live in poverty.

46. The City should formally acknowledge the deep-rooted history and present-day realities of colonialism and racism.
47. The City should adopt a racial equity lens and gender based equity analysis to develop, design, and evaluate all of its by-laws, policies, programs and services.
48. The City should require all of its departments to collect and use disaggregated data (on the basis of race and other demographics) to measure the impact of all of its policies, programs and services on diverse and vulnerable communities, and create appropriate transparency and accountability measures within each department to ensure full compliance with an Access, Equity and Inclusion Framework.
49. The City should actively communicate the Access, Equity and Inclusion Framework with the public and engage in ongoing and meaningful consultation with equity seeking groups to monitor the implementation of the Framework.
50. The City should ensure that it removes all barriers to its services on the basis of immigration status, and it should work with the province to remove such barriers to services that fall under their shared jurisdiction.
51. The City should adopt an Employment Equity Policy to ensure its workforce is reflective of the city's diversity.

F. Indigenous Relations

Toronto has been home to a number of Indigenous nations for an estimated 11,000 years, including at various times the Mississaugas of the Credit, the Anishnabeg, the Chippewa, the Haudenosaunee and the Wendat peoples. Today, it is home to approximately 70,000 First Nations, Inuit and Métis people--by far the largest gathering place of Indigenous people in Canada.

Since contact, colonial and Canadian governments have not treated Indigenous nations in this area fairly or justly. For example, the Treaty recognizing the Mississauga's First Nations land was breached by the Canadian government, forcing the Mississauga's to relocate from what became Toronto onto lands provided by the Six Nations (Haudenosaunee) of the Grand River.

Our city has a responsibility to be a major actor in addressing issues of importance to its Indigenous residents, and must play a leadership role in addressing those issues, in collaboration with Indigenous peoples and other levels of government. There is an urgent need for a new relationship between the city and its diverse Indigenous population.

A 2016 study (Our Health Counts Toronto) found that Indigenous peoples in the city face a wide array of very serious socio-economic challenges. 87% of Indigenous Torontonians fall below the Low Income Cut Off. Some 63% are unemployed.

Indigenous residents generally report poorer health and mental health outcomes, a much greater incidence of homelessness or under-housing, poor food security and nutritional issues and involvement of child protection agencies in their families.

Over a quarter have a family member or close friend who has gone missing. A majority of Indigenous adults in the city have done some time in prison. A majority also reports having experienced incidents of racism.

The lasting, generational effects of the residential school system, land loss and cultural dislocation continue to be serious determinants of the quality of life of Indigenous Canadians, including those in Toronto.

There is much work to be done to rectify these historic wrongs and close the socio/economic gap between Indigenous and non-Indigenous peoples in the city.

It's beyond the scope of the Charter City proposal to make informed and qualified recommendations for specific actions to build a new relationship between the city and its Indigenous population and to improve the quality of life conditions of Indigenous peoples. We leave those to a recommended process led by Indigenous leaders and representatives in collaboration with government leaders and policy experts.

To that end, the reports of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission of Canada outline some of the ways in which local government can be of assistance in effective ways, including, but not limited to:

- reinforcing Indigenous languages
- improving health outcomes and social determinants of health
- funding community reconciliation
- adopting the UN Declaration on the Rights of Indigenous People at the municipal level
- training municipal staff on the history and present-day realities of Indigenous people
- collecting and making available records of residential schools in their area

There are likely other actions that can be taken to build a new relationship and close the gap.

We recommend that any working group formed to negotiate a City Charter between the city and the province of Ontario should include meaningful Indigenous representation at the highest level. Consultation and reconciliation with Indigenous communities, and charting a new relationship between the city and its First Nations, Métis and Inuit populations should be a high priority of the city and the province (with appropriate involvement of the government of Canada) in the Charter City process.

Humber Bay Arch Bridge, Etobicoke | Photo Credit: alyssablack, Flickr

The Bigger Picture

It has been noted that some city functions spill over Toronto's boundaries into neighbouring municipalities – transit, human services and the natural environment are three examples. This has highlighted a concern that a Charter for the city of Toronto alone is too limited.

This proposal makes it clear that Toronto should have the ability to enter into agreements with other municipalities to deal with such issues.

There is currently no structure within the Greater Toronto Area capable of becoming a Charter City beyond the city's boundaries – we have no choice but to work with the existing municipalities and their boundaries. Other municipalities may be interested in a Charter. This proposal could be a model on which they can build.

Whether or not they opt to pursue Charter status, neighbouring municipalities should work closely together to ensure that the issues that cross over municipal boundaries are reasonably addressed.

When Toronto secures a Charter, other cities in Ontario, indeed across Canada, can use Toronto's example to secure a Charter for themselves. There is no reason that the adoption of a City Charter should be limited just to Toronto.

Contact Us:

Email

CharterCityToronto@gmail.com

Website

CharterCityToronto.ca

Facebook

Charter City Toronto

Twitter

@ CharterCity_TO

Proposal Developed by:

Henrich Bechmann

David Del Grande

Doug Earl

Merrilee Evans

Russ Ford

Tim Grant

Rob Jamieson

John Jeffrey

Alan Kasperski

Beth Levy

Sean Manners

Sean Meagher

Ashley Quan

Pedram Rahbari

Ceta Rankhalawansingh

John Sewell

Adam Smith